Most IT workers expect networks to scale, says ONStor

31 Mar 2008

Scalability is among the fundamental expectations of most IT workers when addressing their network-attached storage, according to ONStor.

The company claims that the majority (55 per cent) of respondents to a recent survey anticipate that their existing network will be able to expand to cope with the growing demands placed upon it.

ONStor points out that this leaves a share of 45 per cent of the market who do not think their network has the scalability necessary to cope should their data levels rise significantly in the future.

Marcos Burnett, country manager for the UK, adds that consumption of power and cooling processes also emerged in the study as being high on the agenda for many IT managers.

"However, what is clear is that scalability is at the forefront of the minds of those responsible for the data centre," he asserts.

ONStor recently revealed that it has joined action group The Green Grid which addresses energy efficiency throughout data centres at an industry level.
